

The big city, the lights, the skyline.... Dreams, dreams, intoxicating dreams... Image, icon, scene... Lights, lights, more lights. Something special. Life in the palm of your hands. Forever, forever... Youth untouched by time; radiant, eternal sunlight; the freedom of a present untethered to a future, freedom from obligations, freedom to dream. Open fields stretching out to infinity. Young bodies that are equally innocent and performatively aware. Soldiers of love. One hopes to become a timeless image, a still.

This image is seductive, all too seductive: it promises light. It promises itself as a dream. Pop-culture, the American ideal, alternative lifestyle mags - all vaguely hinted, as symbols that have passed their own threshold. Symbols that have crossed into the real. Naturalized parts of a collective identity and a shared story. These photographs belong to a language that has long dissolved into the local imagination. Fashion image, national mythology, and innermost private fantasy coincide in a shower of white light.

Opening night. Another scene, another dream - the promise of intimacy and fame. The promise of daylight. The promise of an eternal afternoon. People are coming and going. Dreamers are marching in circle. Yearning for something to simultaneously recognize and desire. Something deeply familiar and strangely out of reach. Eternity in pictures and a timeless abstraction. The closer you look the further you are. People are tilting their heads. Something stares back. Something whispers. Closer, come closer. A weightless gust of wind brushes the back of your neck. Cool ambient city light bleeds through the windows. A crowd of dreamers is illuminated by light that has no source.

Eric Varshavsky

info@hi-mountain.net @hi_mountain_